

Master Bogumil's workshop is all heat and haste — feast-orders for the great houses due by morning, the oven roaring in the back. The baker himself you do not see; he has not the moment to spare. But the jars are set out waiting on the bench, and wedged among them, in a hand dusted with flour, a note dashed off for whoever he could trust to come.

Friends — forgive the scrawl, I've no hour to spare. A fool of an apprentice wiped my labels and set the lids back wrong, and I'll not heat the oven on a guess: one wrong root sours the whole batch. You've keen senses and you're from here, so you'll know them — take their measure however you can, only do not open them, for a spice once aired is spoiled. And hold to my recipe: half the names they handed me never went near a piernik.

And one thing more, while I've the quill. Big orders tonight, while the great men feast and nurse their grievance with the castle. Let it come to war — and it will — and see who pays. The lords keep their walls and their tolls; I lose my custom, the honey doubles, the roads close on my spice. A rising of rich men, and bakers and fishwives foot the bill. Rich stay rich, poor stay poor, and I'm the last sober head in a town gone to dancing.

— Master Bogumil

You carry letters tonight for the very men he means. There is no one here to say it to. You set the note down and take up the first jar.

Seven jars, and no two alike – if your senses are keen enough to part them. Trust what they tell you, and set the right name to each letter on his card. Some of the names he was handed belong to no PIERNIK at all; for those, his recipe is your guide.

↪ GAME MASTER – Bring the filled card to the Game Master. If the pierniki come out right, you'll have your pay – and a sealed letter telling you what to do next.
