

The night you served has come. Across Toruń the carnival gutters out, the masks come down — and the Order's quiet work shows its face at last.

You did what was asked. You walked into the rebels' nest, sat at their cook's table, marked the man and the hour. Now one thing remains: to prove, to the Komtur's own face, that you are the Order's and no one else's.

The Order does not take a courier on trust. You already carry the proof, if you can read it: that coded line you came away with — a scrap of the Order's own dispatch, the watchword folded into it that every true son of the Order can draw out and no stranger can. Read your sign, find its row in the table, and let the marks give up their word.

The word you read is the Order's own. Carry it to the walls.

---

At Przedzamcze, where the fortress stands in ruin, the eighth bell will bring the Komtur into the dark — and across from him, the rebels' chairman. Between them, a single choice: into whose hands your sealed letter goes.

Speak the watchword to the Komtur, and he will take what you carry. Withhold it — or carry the letter to the other man — and that is your choice to make.

The eighth bell. The ruins. You walk.