

You know now.

The cook with the ladle — the man who tested you, who trusted you, who sent you into the castle. Jordan is Hans von Baysen: the chairman of the Council, the man this letter was meant for from the very first hour.

Outside, the carnival is burning itself out. The pipes have gone quiet, the masks coming off all over Toruń — and yours with them. No more faces to wear.

The letter has ridden in your bag since morning. Sealed, unread, unbroken — and so it stays. Whatever words are folded inside, they were never yours to know. You were only ever the hands that carried it.

It ends at the castle. At Przedzamcze, where the Order's fortress stands in ruin, the eighth bell will bring two men into the dark.

One is the chairman — the man who was Jordan all along. The other is Albrecht, the Komtur, the Order's hand in Toruń. Between them, a single choice: into whose hands the letter goes.

The eighth bell. The ruins. You walk.